CONVERSATION WITH AN UNDERSTANDING ATTORNEY

MARY KENNAN HERBERT *

You said it is important to dig up those earliest fragments.
I agree, I should dust 'em off. Look at Dad once again, that Polish kid with slicked-down blond hair, posed on a pony.
Look at two-year-old Mom with shiny black hair combed carefully to one side, round toddler wearing a grin hinting of Scots-Irish and Cherokee stories of self-destruction, freedom, blood.
Those photos are fading and hiding what I need to know,
or what I want to tell.
How did they meet, those trusting kids who leaned on each other in quick movie passion, WWII style?
Think of her at 80, remembering the names of family cows and horses on a farm now lost, now buried like her ashes located conveniently to an Interstate.
And his stories of ghost-parents dancing to a Victrola while he watched as if in a dream, telling us about his big gray cat, ghost cat, a striped tom rife with symbols, plump stories to please us, to make us want to know more.

How did they meet, exchanging glances in some Midwestern dive,
deciding to speak, to touch?
Now I want to know, so I can again embroider, stitch, paste, and carefully tape imaginary pictures into an old-fashioned story.
Good grief, I can show you.
We can pretend we have all the time in the world.
