INTRODUCTION

The federal rules of practice and procedure regulate litigation in the federal courts and are designed “to promote simplicity in procedure, fairness in administration, the just determination of litigation, and the elimination of unjustifiable expense and delay.”1 The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, in particular, have been described as “among the most significant accomplishments of American jurisprudence,”2 setting the standard “against which all other systems of procedure must be judged.”3 The success of the civil rules led to the establishment of federal rules for criminal, appellate, and bankruptcy procedure, as well as federal rules of evidence.

The process by which the federal rules4 are promulgated, although subject to periodic criticism, has been praised as “perhaps the most thoroughly open, deliberative, and exacting process in the nation for developing substantively neutral rules.”5 The essence of the federal rulemaking process has remained constant for the past sixty years. Its basic features include: (1) the drafting of new rules and rule amendments by prestigious advisory committees composed of judges, lawyers, and law professors; (2) circulation of the committees' drafts to the bench, bar, and public for comment; (3) fresh consideration of the proposed changes by the advisory committees, after taking into account the comments of the bench, bar, and public; (4) careful review of the advisory committees' proposals; (5) promulgation of the proposals by the Supreme Court; and (6) "enactment" of the proposals into law following the expiration of a statutory period in which Congress is given an opportunity to reject, modify, or defer them.

At various points over the last sixty years both Congress and the judiciary have acted to reaffirm and renew the rulemaking process, with the objective of making it more effective and more open. Significant organizational and procedural improvements have been made as a result both of self-evaluation efforts by the judiciary and criticisms from the bar and Congress. One recommendation in the Proposed Long Range Plan for the Federal Courts, which was recently approved by the Judicial Conference of the United States, reaffirms the judiciary's commitment to periodic, comprehensive reexaminations of the rulemaking process. The Plan recommends that:

- rules of practice, procedure, and evidence should be developed exclusively in accordance with the time-tested and orderly process established by the Rules Enabling Act;
- the national rules should strive for greater uniformity of practice and procedure in the federal courts, but individual courts should have some limited rulemaking authority to account for differing local circumstances and to experiment with innovative procedures; and
- the Judicial Conference and the courts should seek significant participation in rulemaking by the interested public and representatives of the bar, including federal and state judges.

Part I of this Article provides a brief history of the federal rulemaking process. Part II describes the current rulemaking procedures, focusing on how they have been changed to address past criticisms. Part III discusses future initiatives in the rulemaking process.

I. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Although there has been debate among scholars over the authority of the federal judiciary, vis-à-vis Congress, to promulgate procedural rules for the federal courts,10 the matter was resolved by the Rules Enabling Act of 1934.11 By virtue of the Act, Congress delegated almost all rulemaking authority to the judiciary, reserving to itself the post facto right to reject, enact, amend, or defer any of the rules. The legislation delegated to the Supreme Court the explicit power to prescribe rules for the district courts governing practice and procedure in civil actions.12

In 1935, the Supreme Court appointed a blue ribbon advisory committee to draft the first Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.13 Over the next two years, the advisory committee widely circulated proposed drafts to the bench and bar for comment, and it made numerous changes to the drafts thanks to extensive assistance from the legal profession.14 After the Supreme Court adopted the rules and

Congress did not act to modify them, the civil rules took effect in September 1938.15

In 1940, Congress authorized the Supreme Court to promulgate rules governing criminal cases in the district courts.16 The Supreme Court followed the same procedure it had used to prepare the civil rules. A distinguished advisory committee prepared and circulated draft rule proposals, received comments from the bench and bar, and submitted the proposed rules to the Court.17 The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure took effect, by operation of law, without congressional action in March 1946.18

In 1958, Congress enacted legislation transferring the major responsibility for the rulemaking function from the Supreme Court to the Judicial Conference of the United States.19 The Conference was mandated to "carry on a continuous study of the operation and effect of the [federal] rules" and to recommend appropriate amendments in the rules.20 The Supreme Court retained its statutory authority to promulgate the rules, but it would henceforth do so by acting on recommendations made by the Judicial Conference.21

Following enactment of the 1958 legislation, the Judicial Conference established a Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure and five advisory committees, to amend or create the civil, criminal, bankruptcy, appellate, and admiralty rules.22 The Standing Committee's mission was to supervise the rulemaking process for the Conference and to coordinate and approve the work of the advisory committees.23

The Admiralty Rules were merged into the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1966.24 The Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure took effect in 1968,25 the federal Bankruptcy Rules became law in

New proposed rules and amendments to the rules approved by the Supreme Court were accepted by Congress without change for approximately thirty-five years following promulgation of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The picture changed sharply in the 1970s, however, as a result of controversy surrounding the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Chief Justice Earl Warren appointed an advisory committee to draft rules of evidence in 1965, and the Supreme Court transmitted the rules to Congress in 1972. Immediate concern was expressed that the judiciary had exceeded its statutory authority on the grounds that: (1) the Rules Enabling Act, which authorized the Supreme Court to promulgate rules of "practice and procedure," was not broad enough to govern the promulgation of rules of evidence; and (2) the new rules had impermissibly overstepped the boundary between procedure and substance, particularly in attempting to supersede evidentiary privileges established by state law.

Congress deferred the proposed rules indefinitely and held extensive hearings on them. Eventually, the Federal Rules of Evidence were revised by Congress and enacted into law by affirmative legislation. The principal legislative revision was to eliminate the proposed federal evidentiary privileges, thereby continuing to leave the matter to federal common law and applicable state law. Congress also amended the Rules Enabling Act to give the judiciary explicit authority to amend the Federal Rules of Evidence. It provided, however, that no rule establishing, abolishing, or modifying a privilege has any force unless approved by an act of Congress.\textsuperscript{35}

Following enactment of the Federal Rules of Evidence, Congress periodically intervened to delay, reject, or modify proposed federal rules.\textsuperscript{36} The controversy over the evidence rules also evoked criticism directed at the procedures under which the new rules had been promulgated. Generally, the complaints were that the process was not sufficiently "open" and had not allowed for adequate public input.\textsuperscript{37} Accordingly, one member of the House Judiciary Committee suggested that the time was ripe to reexamine the rulemaking process and possibly amend the Rules Enabling Act.\textsuperscript{38}

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, in his 1979 \textit{The State of the Federal Judiciary} report, took note of the controversy and suggested that it was time to take a "fresh look" at the entire rulemaking process.\textsuperscript{39} He requested that the Judicial Conference and the Federal Judicial Center, the judiciary's primary research arm, study the matter in light of the experience under the Rules Enabling Act.\textsuperscript{40} In response, the Federal Judicial Center prepared a report to assist the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure.\textsuperscript{41} The report analyzed the strengths and weaknesses of the process and focused on those aspects of the process that had been singled out for criticisms and change.\textsuperscript{42}

The Standing Committee conducted a comprehensive review of rulemaking procedures and instituted a number of changes. The innovations included making the records considered by the rules committees available to the public, documenting all changes made by the committees at the various stages of the process, and conducting public hearings on proposed amendments. The Conference also committed its procedures to writing and published them for the benefit of the bench and bar.\footnote{43}

In 1983, the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties, and the Administration of Justice initiated a comprehensive review of the rulemaking process.\footnote{44} The House Subcommittee conducted hearings in both the 98th and 99th Congresses, during which it invited comment on the rulemaking process and engaged in a productive dialogue with the Judicial Conference and the Standing Committee chairman.\footnote{45}

Following five years of study, hearings, and dialogue, the House subcommittee marked up a bill to codify formally some of the rulemaking procedures already being used by the Judicial Conference and also to require that all meetings of rules committees be open to the public and that minutes of the meetings be prepared.\footnote{46} The legislation ratified the Judicial Conference’s authority to appoint a standing committee and appropriate advisory committees.\footnote{47}

The House version of the legislation specified “that each rules committee consist of ‘a balanced cross section of bench and bar, and trial and appellate judges.’”\footnote{48} The judiciary endorsed this provision.\footnote{49} As eventually enacted, however, the legislation did not contain the requirement of a balanced cross section, merely providing for the committees to consist of trial judges, appellate judges, and members of the bar.\footnote{50}

One of the major objectives of the House sponsors of the legislation was to eliminate the “supersession” clause of the 1934 Act, providing that “all laws in conflict with . . . rules [promulgated under the Act] shall be of no further force or effect after such rules have taken effect.”\footnote{51} It was asserted that the clause was unnecessary because its original purpose (to override various procedural rules scattered throughout the United States Code) had passed. More importantly, it was argued that the provision was of questionable constitutional validity in light of INS v. Chadha, because the Rules Enabling Act authorizes the repeal of statutes without conforming to the requirements of Article I. The Senate, however, did not accept the House provision, and the Rules Enabling Act amendments were enacted in 1988 without deleting the supersession clause.

The 1988 amendments also attempted to stem the proliferation of local rules of courts and to provide for more public participation in the adoption of local rules. The House subcommittee expressed particular concern that some local court rules were inconsistent with federal rules and statutes. It noted, however, that the Judicial Conference had taken steps to deal with the problems of local rules by: (1) establishing a Local Rules Project to review all local rules, and
(2) amending the national rules to require that local court rules be prescribed only after giving appropriate public notice and an opportunity to comment.

Congress codified these local rule requirements in the Rules Enabling Act. It also required each court, other than the Supreme Court, to appoint an advisory committee to study the court's rules of practice and internal operating procedures and make recommendations concerning them. The legislation gave the judicial councils of the circuits authority to modify or abrogate any district court local rules and the Judicial Conference the authority to modify or abrogate the local rules of any court of appeals or other federal court except the Supreme Court.

at 16-17. In Chadha, the Court held that the one-house veto provision of the Immigration and Naturalization Act, under which either the House or the Senate could by resolution invalidate an executive branch decision to allow a deportable alien to remain in the United States, was unconstitutional because Article I of the Constitution requires all legislation to be passed by both the House and the Senate and either signed by the President or repassed by both the Ironically, while Congress attempted to promote national uniformity and limit the proliferation of local court rules in 1988, it took an entirely different approach just two years later in enacting the Civil Justice Reform Act of 1990. That legislation requires each district court to implement its own, individualized civil justice expense and delay reduction plan.

II. CURRENT RULEMAKING PROCEDURES

Although many changes have been made in operating procedures, the rulemaking structure today is essentially the same as that established by the Judicial Conference following the 1958 legislation assigning it the central role in drafting and monitoring the federal rules. The Conference's Standing Committee supervises the rulemaking process and recommends to the Conference such changes to the rules as it believes are necessary to maintain consistency and promote the interest of justice.

The Standing Committee is assisted by five advisory committees, each of which is responsible for one set of federal rules, i.e., civil, criminal, appellate, bankruptcy, or evidence. The advisory committees conduct ongoing studies of the operation of their respective rules, prepare appropriate amendments and new rules, draft explanatory committee notes, conduct hearings, and submit proposed changes through the Standing Committee to the Judicial Conference.

A. Committee Membership

The committees are composed of federal judges, practicing lawyers, law professors, state chief justices, and representatives of the Department of Justice. Each committee has a Reporter, a law professor with demonstrated expertise in the committee's subject area, who is responsible for coordinating the committee's agenda and drafting appropriate amendments to the rules and explanatory committee notes. The Administrative Office of the United States Courts, through the Office of the Secretary and the Rules Committee Support Office, coordinates the operational aspects of the rules process, provides administrative and legal support to the committees, and maintains the committees' records.

During congressional hearings in the 1970s and 1980s, it was argued that the rulemaking committees were not broadly based and did not adequately reflect the diversity of the legal community. In addition, there has been criticism that there are not enough practicing lawyers on the committees. The present composition of the committees is as follows:

The advisory committee that drafted the original Federal Rules of Civil Procedure was comprised entirely of lawyers and professors. Judges were added to the committees shortly thereafter and eventually became a large majority on each committee. In the past few years, however, the number of attorneys vis-à-vis judges on the committees has been increasing. Federal judges presently are a minority on three of the six committees, and they constitute about fifty percent of the membership of the committees as a whole.

69. The American Bar Association, for example, has proposed that "practicing lawyers" comprise a majority of the rules committees. Resolution of the ABA House of Delegates, Aug. 9-10, 1994.

The committees' membership is geographically balanced and increasingly represents different perspectives within the legal profession, including members of large and small law firms, government attorneys, "public interest" lawyers, teachers, federal defenders, and criminal defense attorneys. Diversity in membership has increased, but the primary criteria for membership remain professional ability and experience.

Commentators suggested that there be greater turnover in the membership of the committees. This objective has been achieved. At present, members of the rules committees, as with almost all Judicial Conference committees, serve for terms of three years. Only one reappointment is allowed. Thus, a member may serve on a committee for a maximum of six years. Chairs of the committees are normally appointed for just one three-year term. The current chair of the Standing Committee is District Judge Alicemarie H. Stotler of the Central District of California, who was appointed by the Chief Justice in 1993.

Several of the committees invite persons with important and specialized knowledge to assist them as a resource at committee meetings. The appellate and bankruptcy committees, for example, have included a clerk of court in their deliberations for many years. The clerks are extremely helpful in identifying the practical impact of the rules on administrative operations and on case management. In addition, the bankruptcy committee invites the director of the U.S. trustee program to participate in committee meetings.

B. Publication of Procedures

During the early 1980s, the Judicial Conference was criticized for not having published its rulemaking procedures. In response, in 1983 the Standing Committee developed a written Statement of Procedures for the Conduct of Business by the Judicial Conference Committees on Rules of Practice and Procedure, which incorporated long-standing practices of the rules committees and adopted many suggested procedural improvements. The publication requirement was codified in the 1988 amendments to the Rules Enabling Act.

The rulemaking procedures are now published as an integral part of the public announcement of all proposed rule amendments when they are distributed to the bench and bar. A new easy-to-read pamphlet, The Federal Rules of Practice and Procedure: A Summary for Bench and Bar, is also included with all distributions to the public and is made available to bar groups and others as a means of fostering knowledge about the rulemaking process and stimulating comments on the rules.

C. Soliciting Comments from the Public

A number of people complained that inadequate advance notice had been provided of proposed amendments to the rules, thereby depriving the public of a meaningful opportunity to shape the rules before promulgation. In addition, it was said that the mailing list for distribution of proposed amendments was too limited. Accordingly, proposals for amendments in the rules did not reach a sufficiently broad cross section of the legal profession.

Today, extensive efforts are made to reach all segments of the bench and bar, as well as organizations and individuals likely to be interested in or affected by proposed changes to the rules. The Administrative Office mails all rules proposals to about forty major legal publishing firms, and they are reprinted in advance sheets. They are also mailed to more than 10,000 persons and organizations on its rules mailing list, including—

- federal judges and other federal court officers,
- U.S. Attorneys and other Department of Justice officials,
- other federal government agencies and officials,
- federal defenders,
- state chief justices,
- state attorneys general,
- legal publications,
- law schools,
- bar associations, and
- any lawyer, individual, or organization who requests distribution.

In addition to circulating the full text of all proposed rule amendments and advisory committee notes, the Administrative Office now prepares "user-friendly" pamphlets summarizing the proposed amendments and highlighting the dates of scheduled public hearings and the cut off date for written comments. The pamphlets are distributed together with the full text of the amendments and advisory committee notes. The bench and bar are informed in all publications that further information and materials may be obtained from the Secretary and the Rules Committee Support Office, whose address and telephone number are provided.

To supplement the general mailings, the advisory committees have sought to obtain important input through special mailings to targeted segments of the legal profession and interested organizations. In September 1994, for example, the Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence solicited public comment on statutory changes to Federal Rules of Evidence 413, 414, and 415, dealing with evidence of prior, similar acts in cases involving sexual assault or child molestation. The mailing was sent to 900 professors of evidence, 40 women's rights organizations, and 1000 other interested individuals and organizations.

The goal of the committees is to stimulate greater participation by the bar in the rulemaking process by actively encouraging individuals and organizations to comment on specific amendments to the rules and to identify problems in the operation and effect of the rules.

generally. The public comments are extraordinarily helpful and are taken very seriously by the committees. They regularly result in improvements in the amendments, and have led to the withdrawal of proposed amendments. 81

In addition to increasing the amount, readability, and distribution of printed information on the rules, the advisory committees seek input from the bar outside the context of specific pending amendments. The Advisory Committee on Civil Rules has invited bar organizations to send representatives to attend its meetings, and it has, in appropriate cases, solicited the views of lawyers and professors on preliminary proposals before they were drafted.

The advisory committees have also convened special meetings with lawyers and nonlawyers to assess the potential need for rule changes to certain discrete areas of practice. The civil advisory committee, for example, has invited knowledgeable, experienced lawyers to meet with it to explore the problems of class actions and mass tort litigation. The bankruptcy committee has met with chapter 13 lawyers and trustees to examine the impact of the bankruptcy rules on chapter 13 cases. It has also invited publishers to provide input on the bankruptcy forms.

D. Documentation of Changes

People had voiced complaints that the deliberations of the committees were not adequately documented and that it was difficult to discern the rationale for proposed changes to the rules and to discover the minority views of members. 82 Additionally, some expressed concern that proposed amendments were materially changed after they had been circulated for comment and that no opportunity for further comment had been provided. 83

Under current procedures, each action taken by a committee with regard to a proposed amendment is documented and included in the public record. The advisory committees are required to submit a separate “Gap” report, summarizing the public comments and explaining any changes made following publication. The Standing Committee submits a report to the Judicial Conference setting forth

81. For example, the Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules deferred action on proposed amendments to Criminal Rules 10 and 43 in response to generally negative written comments and public testimony. The proposed amendments would have permitted the use of video conferencing in arraignments and in other pretrial sessions when the accused was not present in the courtroom. H.R. Doc. No. 65, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. 15-16 (1995).

the reasons for all proposed amendments and identifying any changes it made in the recommendations of the advisory committee. After the Conference approves amendments, the Administrative Office transmits to the Supreme Court the text of the proposed amendments, the advisory committee notes, pertinent portions from the advisory committee and Standing Committee reports, and a special report identifying any controversial proposals and explaining the source and nature of the controversy.

If an advisory committee or the Standing Committee makes any "substantial" change in a rule after publication, it normally provides an additional period for public notice and comment. Changes more extensive than the original publication are republished. On the other hand, if a change is similar to, but less extensive than the original publication, it will not generally be republished. Similarly, purely technical changes and corrections are not normally published for comment.

E. Public Hearings

During the course of the controversy over adoption of the Federal Rules of Evidence in the early 1970s, there were complaints that the judiciary had not held public hearings on the proposed rules. Written statements were seen as an inadequate substitute for the opportunity of the public to appear in person and engage in a face-to-face dialogue with decisionmakers. Today, public hearings are scheduled on all proposed changes to the rules. Where the subject matter of the changes is controversial, such as the 1992 amendments to Rule 26 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, large numbers of individuals and organizations will ask to testify. On the other hand, many hearings attract few or no requests to testify and are cancelled for lack of public interest.

F. Open Meetings

There had been criticism that the meetings of the Standing Committee and the advisory committees were not open to the public. Until enactment of the 1988 amendments to the Rules Enabling Act, meetings of the Standing Committee and the advisory committees were not open to the public.

committees had generally been closed to the public. The 1988 amendments to the Rules Enabling Act require open meetings, but allow a committee to go into executive session for cause.\footnote{28 U.S.C. § 2073(c) (1988). The authority has been exercised rarely.}

All meetings of the rules committees are open to the public and are announced in advance in the \textit{Federal Register} and leading legal publications. For the most part, though, public attendance is light, except when committees address controversial items.\footnote{The April 1994 meeting of the Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules, which included a discussion of cameras in the courtroom, was televised on C-SPAN.}

\section*{G. Open Records}

There had been complaints that committee agendas and materials relied upon in promulgating rules were not made available to the public.\footnote{1983-84 \textit{Hearings}, supra note 2, at \textit{34}, \textit{35} (statement of Alan B. Morrison, Director, Public Citizen Litigation Group).} Filed comments were made available only to persons with a "legitimate purpose" in seeing them, and minutes, reporters' notes, memoranda, and drafts were not made public until 1980.\footnote{See \textit{Brown}, supra note 8, at \textit{23}, \textit{27}; \textit{cf. 1983-84 Hearings}, supra note 2, at \textit{36-39} (statement of Alan B. Morrison, Director Public Citizen Litigation Group) (noting that filed comments were not widely read).}

Today, all records are open and readily available from the Administrative Office, including minutes of committee meetings, suggestions and comments submitted by individuals and organizations, statements of witnesses, transcripts of public hearings, and memoranda prepared by the reporters. In addition, the reports of the Standing Committee to the Judicial Conference and the minutes of Standing Committee and advisory committee meetings are available on-line through computer-assisted legal research.

All records more than two years old—dating back to 1935—have been placed on microfiche and indexed. They are available for review either at the Administrative Office or at a government repository and may be purchased from a commercial service. Planning has begun on developing an electronic docket of all records and expanding the availability of materials electronically.

\section*{H. Length of the Process}

The rulemaking process demands exacting and meticulous care in drafting proposed rule changes. It is time-consuming and involves a minimum of seven stages of formal input and review. From beginning to end, it usually takes two to three years for a suggestion to be enacted as a rule, fourteen months of which is directly attributable to the built-in statutory period for review by the Supreme Court and Congress. This seven-step process is discussed below.

1. Initial consideration by the advisory committee

   Proposed changes to the rules are initiated in writing by lawyers, judges, clerks of court, law professors, government agencies, or other individuals and organizations. The Secretary acknowledges each suggestion and distributes it to the appropriate advisory committee, whose Reporter analyzes it and makes appropriate recommendations for consideration by the committee. The suggestions and the Reporter's recommendations are placed on the committee's agenda and normally discussed at its next meeting. The Secretary now advises each person making a suggestion of its eventual disposition. When an advisory committee decides that a particular change in the rules has merit, it normally asks its Reporter to prepare a draft amendment to the rules and an explanatory committee note.

2. Publication and public comment

   Once an advisory committee has voted initially to pursue a new rule or an amendment to the rules, it must obtain the approval of the Standing Committee, or its chair, to publish the proposal for public comment. In seeking publication, the advisory committee must explain to the Standing Committee the reasons for its proposal, including any minority or separate views.

   Once publication is approved, the Secretary arranges for printing and wide distribution of the proposed amendment to the bench and bar, to publishers, and to the general public. The public is normally given six months to comment on the proposal. During the six-month comment period, one or more public hearings on the proposed changes are scheduled.

3. Consideration of the public comments and final approval by the advisory committee

   At the end of the public comment period, the Reporter is required to prepare a summary of the written comments received from the public and the testimony presented at the hearings. The advisory committee then takes a fresh look at the proposed rule changes in light of all the written comments and testimony.

   If the advisory committee decides to proceed in final form, it submits the proposed rule or amendment to the Standing Committee for approval. Each proposal must be accompanied by a separate report summarizing the comments received from the public and explaining any changes made by the advisory committee following the original publication. The advisory committee's report must also include minority views of any members who wish to have their separate views recorded. If, on the other hand, the advisory committee decides to make any substantial change in its proposal, it will republish it for further public comment.

4. Approval by the standing committee

The Standing Committee considers the final recommendations of the advisory committee and may accept, reject, or modify them. If the Standing Committee approves a proposed rule change, it will transmit the change to the Judicial Conference with a recommendation for approval, accompanied by the advisory committee's reports and its own report explaining any changes it made. If the Standing Committee makes a modification that constitutes a substantial change from the recommendation made by the advisory committee, the proposal will normally be returned to the advisory committee with appropriate instructions.

5. Judicial Conference approval

The Judicial Conference normally considers proposed amendments to the rules at its September session each year. If it approves the amendments, they are transmitted to the Supreme Court.

6. Supreme Court approval

The Supreme Court has seven months, from the time the proposed amendments are received from the Conference until May 1, to review them, prescribe them, and transmit them to Congress.

7. Congressional review

Congress has a statutory period of at least seven months to act on any new rules or amendments prescribed by the Supreme Court. If Congress does not enact positive legislation to reject, modify, or defer the rules or amendments, they take effect as a matter of law on December 1.

Previously, the effective date had been 90 days after the Chief Justice reported the changes to Congress, i.e., about August 1. See 28 U.S.C. § 2075.
The lengthy process may be expedited when there is an urgent need to consider an amendment to the rules. This normally occurs when Congress has requested prompt consideration of a proposal or when legislation has been introduced in Congress to amend the rules directly by statute. The fourteen-month delay for review by the Supreme Court and Congress, however, is established by statute and cannot be reduced by the Judiciary.93

I. Supreme Court Review

It has been proposed that the Supreme Court be removed from the rulemaking process and that the rules be promulgated by the Judicial Conference.94 The original version of the legislation that became the Rules Enabling Act amendments of 1988, for example, would have removed the Supreme Court from the rulemaking process.95 The provision, however, was withdrawn after Chief Justice Burger informed the chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee that “[t]he Justices conclude that it would be better to keep the ultimate authority of passing on rulemaking within the Court as it is now, but to allow the Court to defer to the decision of the Judicial Conference.”96

On most occasions, the Court has deferred to the Judicial Conference and has prescribed without change proposed rules amendments submitted by the Judicial Conference.97 Nevertheless, the Court has accorded serious, independent review to proposed amendments in the

96. Letter from Warren E. Burger, Chief Justice of the United States, to Chairman Robert W. Kastenmeier, reprinted in 1983-84 Hearings, supra note 2, at 195. The Conference of Chief Justices of the States also opposed elimination of a role for the Supreme Court, arguing that "the rule-making power is an inherent power necessary to the functioning of the judicial branch of government and ... should be vested only in the Supreme Court itself." Letter of March 6, 1984 from Connecticut Chief Justice John A. Speziale to Robert W. Chairman Kastenmeier, reprinted in 1983-84 Hearings, supra note 2, at 231.

97. In voting to prescribe the 1993 amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Justice White stated that the Court should defer to the Judicial Conference and its committees if they have a rational basis for the proposed amendments to the rules. Justice White saw the Court's role as limited to transmitting the Judicial Conference's recommendations without change and without careful study, as long as the rules committee system has acted with integrity. See Communication from the Chief Justice, the Supreme Court of the United States, Transmitting Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Forms, Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2072, 113 S. Ct. 476, 575, 578-79 (1992) [hereinafter Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure] (statement of Justice White).
1990s, deferring a proposed amendment to Rule 4 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1991, approving amendments to Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and five civil discovery rules over three dissents in 1993, and withholding part of the amendments to Rule 412 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1994. The Court's recent orders transmitting rules changes to Congress have specified that: "While the Court is satisfied that the required procedures have been observed, this transmittal does not necessarily indicate that the Court itself would have proposed these amendments in the form submitted."

Although the length of the rulemaking process would be shortened by eliminating the role of the Supreme Court, the Court's enormous prestige clearly contributes to the legitimacy and credibility of the process.

III. CONTINUING RENEWAL EFFORTS

Most of the criticisms of the rulemaking process over the past twenty years have been addressed by procedural improvements made by the Judicial Conference and the 1988 amendments to the Rules Enabling Act. Nevertheless, the rules committees are continuing to examine other important procedural issues that have not been fully resolved.

A. Long Range Planning

The judiciary established a permanent long range planning process designed to identify the mission and future directions of the federal courts. The Proposed Long Range Plan for the Federal Courts (Plan) is the first major product of this planning process. With regard to the federal rules, the Plan encourages significant participation by the bar.

in the rulemaking process, exclusive adherence to the Rules Enabling Act process, and greater uniformity in federal practice and procedure.\textsuperscript{103}

As part of the long range planning process, the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure has appointed a long range planning subcommittee to conduct a study of the rulemaking process and make recommendations for procedural improvements. In addition, the advisory committees have initiated their own long range planning efforts. The Advisory Committee on Bankruptcy Rules, for example, has a standing subcommittee on automation that has been active in evaluating the impact of technology and in considering changes to the bankruptcy rules to take advantage of the benefits of automation.\textsuperscript{104}

Likewise, the bankruptcy, appellate, and civil advisory committees have proposed and circulated for public comment proposed rule amendments that would allow individual courts to permit attorneys to file, sign, and verify documents with the court electronically.\textsuperscript{105} If approved through the Rules Enabling Act process, the amendments would take effect on December 1, 1996.\textsuperscript{106}

\textbf{B. Greater Participation by the Bar}

Despite substantial efforts to persuade attorneys to take the time to suggest improvements in the rules and comment on proposed amendments, the bar is considerably less active than the committees would like. A handful of bar organizations and individuals respond regularly to requests for public comments by providing comprehensive, balanced analyses of proposed rules amendments. But most judges, lawyers, and professors simply do not respond to requests for comments, and those who do, generally oppose specific amendments on an ad hoc basis. Accordingly, the public responses tend to be moderate in number and not necessarily representative of the bench and bar as a whole.

The Proposed Long Range Plan for the Federal Courts encourages an active partnership with the bar in the rulemaking process, both through membership of practicing attorneys on the rulemaking committees and greater participation by attorneys and bar associations in commenting on proposed amendments to the rules. The Plan asks the rules committees to continue their outreach efforts in stimulating lawyers and bar associations to provide practical advice to the committees.

As one of his many initiatives to improve judicial administration and service, Administrative Office Director L. Ralph Mecham established a Rules Committee Support Office in 1992 to provide legal and operational support to the Secretary and the rules committees and to provide a higher level of information services to the bar. To stimulate additional responses on rules issues by bar associations, individual lawyers, and academia, the mailing list for the rules is being expanded and rejuvenated. Every six months an additional 200 attorneys and 100 law professors selected at random will be added until an additional 2500 names are added. If no comments are received from addressees for three years, their names will be removed from the list and replaced with others.

The Standing Committee has also requested that the bar associations of each of the states designate an attorney as a point of contact to solicit and coordinate bar comments on proposed amendments. It is anticipated that the bar associations will encourage their members to discuss the rules and provide thoughtful and practical

In proposing the 1958 legislation that required the Judicial Conference to conduct a "continuous study of the operation and effect of the [federal] rules," it was contemplated that the bar would have an active and important part in formulating the rules. "Every member of the bar [should have] an ample opportunity to set forth his views, have them debated, and have them decided." input to the advisory committees. It is also hoped that representatives of the bar will attend committee meetings and hearings.

In an effort to assess the practical operation of the rules, the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules scheduled two conferences in 1995 with members of the bar and academia to discuss class actions and the effectiveness of Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. In addition, members of the advisory committee will participate with attorneys and law professors in a conference to consider the strengths and weaknesses of the civil rules generally.

C. Frequency of Rule Changes

The 1958 statute assigning rulemaking responsibilities to the Judicial Conference requires the Conference to conduct a “continuous study of the operation and effect of the general rules of practice and procedure.” Contemporary commentators suggested that the rules committees should have ample staff, should engage in grassroots surveys, and should conduct hearings, regional meetings, and discussions with the bar to monitor the rules in practice. More recently, Justice Scalia stated that it is essential to have constant reform of the federal rules to correct emerging problems.

The requirement to conduct a continuous study of the operation and effect of the rules, however, does not compel the conclusion that amendments should be frequent. Nor does it imply that all perceived problems with the rules and all conflicts in case law should be rectified. To the contrary, one of the most persistent criticisms of the rules process is that there are simply too many amendments.

Some amendments have been criticized as mere “tinkering” with the rules. And it has been suggested that there should be no

The vision of activist committees with permanent monitoring capabilities, however, never came to pass. In fact, for many years Congress included a strict limit on funding for the rules committees in the judiciary’s annual appropriations.

113. See WRIGHT, supra note 2, at 435. Professor Wright noted that the criminal rules “have been amended so frequently that even scholars in the field find it difficult to follow the constant changes or to be certain what a particular rule provided at a particular time.” Id. Likewise, he pointed out his difficulty in knowing what appellate rules were in effect at a given time, because four different sets of amendments to the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure had recently been adopted or were proceeding to adoption. Charles A. Wright, Foreword: The Malaise of Federal Rulemaking, 14 REV. LITIG. 1, 9 (1994) [hereinafter Wright, Foreword].

change in a rule "unless there is substantial need for the change."¹¹⁵ One critic even has argued for a moratorium on procedural law reform.¹¹⁶

Too many minor changes to the rules can lead to uncertainty and confusion in the bench and bar.¹¹⁷ Constant changes, moreover, tend to undermine the stability and prestige of the rules as a whole. The challenge, therefore, is to weigh the benefits of a proposed improvement in the rules against the inherent cost of introducing change and possible uncertainty.

Some rule amendments, even though minor, are necessary to implement recent legislation,¹¹⁸ to conform to modern language usage,¹¹⁹ to correct improper statutory cross-references,¹²⁰ and to coordinate with pending congressional action.¹²¹ As a general rule, however, there is now a reluctance to make changes to the rules unless they can be shown to be necessary to correct a serious problem in practice. Although many suggestions for improvements in the rules are received from the bench and bar to clarify or reconcile case law among the circuits, the advisory committees have generally opted to allow case law interpreting the rules take its course.¹²²

In September 1994, for example, the Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence published its tentative decisions not to amend twenty-five evidence rules. The committee announced its philosophy that an amendment to a rule should not be undertaken absent a showing either that it is not working well in practice or that it embodies an erroneous policy decision. The advisory committee pointed out that any amendment in the rules of evidence "will create new uncertainties as to interpretation and unexpected problems in practical application."

To avoid the appearance of piecemeal changes, the advisory committees have begun to use the device of deferring and "batching" miscellaneous rule changes into a single package of amendments. One possible option for the advisory committees to consider in the future is to prescribe a set schedule for submitting non-urgent rules changes—perhaps every three to five years. This approach, although appealing, is complicated by unpredictable congressional activity that increasingly tends to interrupt any schedules or planning efforts. The 103d Congress, for example, passed a comprehensive bankruptcy reform law that will require rules changes, and the 104th Congress, as part of the Republican "Contract with America," is considering a number of changes both in civil litigation and criminal law.

It has also been recommended widely that rules changes be predicated on a sounder empirical basis. To that end, the advisory committees have been increasing their requests for assistance from the Federal Judicial Center to conduct research on litigation practices and the impact of the rules. The Federal Judicial Center conducted a major study of Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure before the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules proceeded with the 1993 amendments to that rule. committee also asked the Federal Judicial Center to conduct studies on the use and operation of protective orders under Rule 26(c), offers of settlement under Rule 68, consensual settlement of class actions under Rule 23, and the effect of mandatory disclosure under the 1993 amendments to Rule 26. The Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules considered the results of the Federal Judicial Center’s study on cameras in the courtroom before approving amendments to Rule 53.¹³⁰

D. Content, Organization, and Style of the Rules

Simplicity and uniformity were central goals of the drafters of the federal rules.¹³¹ There are complaints, however, that the rules are no longer simple and uniform, but have become cumbersome, lengthy, and unpredictable.¹³²

Commentators suggest that fundamental changes are needed and that it is time to take a fresh look at the rules.¹³³ It has also been suggested that it is time to reconsider the trans-substantive character of the rules, so that different categories of cases could be governed by different rules.¹³⁴ Obviously, such sweeping changes would take considerable time to effectuate and would require major input from the bar and academia, empirical research, substantial committee deliberations, and public hearings. The civil and bankruptcy advisory committees have, as part of their long range planning efforts, begun to think about whether changes of such magnitude will eventually be necessary or desirable.

Apart from changes to substance, there are opportunities to improve the style, consistency, and readability of the rules. Under the leadership of Judge Robert E. Keeton, former chairman of the Standing Committee, efforts have been initiated to redraft the body of rules in clear and concise English—without substantive change—following the best conventions of modern statutory revision and the advice of legal writing teachers. There are no present plans to adopt the revised version of the rules, but at an appropriate point in the future—perhaps integrated with a major revision of the rules—the "re-styled" language could be substituted for the present language.

The Standing Committee is now assisted by a legal writing consultant and a style subcommittee, and it will publish a guide to clear and simple rule drafting. The consultant works with the advisory committees and their reporters to promote clear and consistent language in proposed rules amendments.

As part of its long range planning efforts, the committees could also consider eventual integration of all five sets of federal rules into one. The result, for example, might be the consolidation of similar provisions that now appear separately in each of the rules, such as the provisions dealing with computation of time, courts' and clerks' offices, and local rules.

E. The Judiciary and Congress

The success of the rulemaking process relies on a delicate balance of authority and continuing cooperation between the judicial and legislative branches of the government. The Rules Enabling Act of 1934, as reaffirmed by Congress in 1988, establishes a statutory structure under which the judiciary prescribes rules of procedure, practice, and evidence for the federal courts, after giving the bench, bar, and public a generous opportunity for input. Congress then retains the ultimate authority to accept, reject, amend, or defer proposed amendments to the rules. The process works exceedingly well when the procedures by which rules are crafted are credible and when mutual respect prevails between the two branches.

The credibility of the rulemaking process was seriously questioned during the 1970s' controversy over the Federal Rules of Evidence. Complaints were made that proceedings before the rules committees had been closed and that changes had been made in the proposals without public notice or input. Complaints about the procedures, combined with concerns that the rulemakers had exceeded their authority and abridged substantive rights, led opponents to petition Congress to defer or reject the rules.\footnote{199}

The credibility of rulemaking procedures has been enhanced by its current openness and accessibility.\footnote{140} When proposed changes to the rules are now submitted to Congress, an extensive public record has been developed to support the changes, including careful consideration by expert advisory committees, public comments, public hearings, and four levels of review. Members of Congress can be assured that the changes received thorough consideration and that all interested parties had an opportunity to comment, both in writing and at hearings. By comparison, it is extremely rare for any product of the legislative process to receive such objective consideration, public input, and expert review.

Congress has a legitimate interest in federal rule amendments because even procedurally neutral rules may affect substantive rights, may give a practical advantage to one type of litigant over another, and may require adjustment of comfortable habits and practices.\footnote{141} Persons and organizations displeased with proposed amendments, accordingly, are likely to exercise their political rights by encouraging Congress to reject or modify specific amendments. Congress, of course, is free under the Rules Enabling Act to make its own independent judgment on the merits of any proposal, but it should—and normally does—give considerable deference to rules amendments prescribed by the Supreme Court.\footnote{142}

\footnote{199} Representative Kastenmeier suggested that "as a result of the shadowy nature of the rulemaking process, a number of proposed rules changes" were rejected by Congress in the 1970s and early 1980s. \textit{1983-84 Hearings, supra} note 2, at 154 (statement of Rep. Kastenmeier from \textit{Congressional Record} of Oct. 18, 1983).

\footnote{140} Professor Wright suggests, however, "that the rulemaking process worked far better when it was carried on in private." Wright, \textit{Foreword, supra} note 113, at 2-3 n.6.

\footnote{141} It has been suggested that some amendments pushed "the rulemaking process into controversial uncharted areas of law and this has been affecting the rights of litigants in a fashion more likely to create the kind of pressure from the public and the legal profession that generates congressional response." Robert N. Clinton, \textit{Rule 9 of the Federal Habeas Corpus Rules: A Case Study on the Need for Reform of the Rules Enabling Acts}, 63 \textit{Iowa L. Rev.} 15, 52 (1977). Any amendments, for example, that are seen as affecting the balance between the prosecution and the defense in criminal cases are likely to generate a congressional response.

As the Proposed Long Range Plan for the Federal Courts points out, however, "[i]t is troubling . . . that bills are introduced in the Congress to amend federal rules directly by statute, bypassing the orderly and objective process established by the Rules Enabling Act."\(^{143}\) In the 103d Congress, for example, at least thirteen provisions were introduced to amend the federal rules without following the prescribed statutory procedures.

Most of the provisions dealt with matters of considerable political interest, such as victims' rights,\(^{144}\) evidence in sexual assault and child molestation cases,\(^{145}\) and other criminal law issues.\(^{146}\) For some controversial social policy issues, it is inevitable—or desirable—to have policy established by the legislature.\(^{147}\) By avoiding the Rules Enabling Act process entirely, however, Congress loses the benefit of the extensive record developed by the rules committees, including the public comments and professional review by judges, lawyers, and law professors. Moreover, recent experience shows that some legislation amending the rules may be enacted without any hearings at all, without public input, and without thoughtful review by the bench and bar.

Two examples from the 103d Congress illustrate contrasting ways in which Congress has dealt with controversial statutory amendments to the rules. In the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act

The result of [the judiciary's rulemaking] procedure is that any change proposed by the Supreme Court has received careful consideration by a number of able people. This does not mean that we in Congress should forgo our responsibility to make an independent judgment on the merit of any proposal. It does mean, however, that we should accord a healthy respect to any amendment proposed by the Supreme Court. Id. Judge Weinstein suggests that Congress should confine itself "to the review of substantial principles," rather than "details of rules." Weinstein, supra note 10, at 963.

146. Legislation, however, has also been introduced as a service to particular constituents. Newly enacted Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 7004(h), for example, requires that service of process on an insured depository institution in certain matters be made by certified mail, rather than first class mail. Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994, supra note 36, § 114. The judiciary objected to the amendment on the grounds that it violated the Rules Enabling Act, was unnecessary, and added expense to the administration of estates. 1994 Judicial Conference Reports, supra note 120, at 14.

147. Judge Weinstein has suggested that: "If a matter becomes important enough for detailed congressional intervention, legislation is probably desirable, with formal participation by both houses and the President." Weinstein, supra note 10, at 940. It has also been suggested that rulemakers should not propose changes, even in matters of procedure, if the changes will have important effects on substantive rights. Wright, Book Review, supra note 31, at 654.
of 1994, Federal Rule of Evidence 412 was completely revised and new Rules 413, 414, and 415 were added. The former received substantial public input and careful review by bench and bar. The latter did not.

The proposed revision of Rule 412, commonly known as the "rape shield" rule, was first included in comprehensive criminal legislation introduced in the Senate. It was designed to extend to all criminal cases and all civil litigation the rule's long-standing prohibition against admitting evidence of a victim's past sexual behavior in a case where the defendant has been accused of a crime of sexual abuse. After the Senate bill was introduced, the judiciary committees of both the House and the Senate asked the Judicial Conference to consider the merits of the proposed rule on an expedited basis.

The Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence drafted a substantially improved version of the Senate rule, circulated it for public comment, and conducted a public hearing. The carefully crafted, revised rule met with overwhelming public approval, including approval from women's rights groups, and was subsequently adopted by the advisory committee, the Standing Committee, and the Judicial Conference. As a result, the House decided not to include a revision of Rule 412 in its version of the crime legislation and chose, instead, to let the rule drafted by the advisory committee take effect in accordance with the normal operation of the Rules Enabling Act.

In contrast to the cooperation between Congress and the judiciary in Rule 412, new Federal Rules of Evidence 413, 414, and 415 were added as floor amendments to the Senate crime control bill without

155. The Supreme Court later withheld approval of the portion of the rule approved by the Judicial Conference that extended its reach to civil cases. Members of the Court were concerned that the proposed rule might violate the Rules Enabling Act, which forbids the enactment of rules that "abridge, enlarge or modify any substantive right," and might encroach on the rights of defendants in sexual harassment cases because it might be inconsistent with Meritor Sav. Bank v. Vinson, 477 U.S. 57 (1986). Letter from William H. Rehnquist, Chief Justice of the United States, to Judge John F. Gerry, Chairman of the Judicial Conference's Executive Committee (Apr. 29, 1994), reprinted in Communication from the Chief Justice, supra note 101, at 684.

Congressional conferees, however, restored the portion of the rule deleted by the Supreme Court, and Congress proceeded to enact revised Rule 412 in the form approved by the Judicial Conference. Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, supra note 36, § 40141.
public comment or hearings and without communication with the rules committees. The new rules will admit evidence of a defendant's past similar acts in a criminal or civil case involving a sexual assault or child molestation offense "for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant." The rules contain no reference to Federal Rule of Evidence 403, which allows a court to exclude evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading of the jury, or needless delay. Neither do they reference the hearsay provisions of Article VIII of the Federal Rules of Evidence. Congressional conferees added a provision to the Senate version of the bill specifying that the new rules would take effect 150 days after enactment, unless the Judicial Conference within that period recommends against them or submits alternate recommendations, in which case the effective date of the rules will be delayed for an additional 150 days.

As a practical matter, the only restraints on Congress are self-imposed. They include the existence of the Rules Enabling Act, which has codified a process of openness and inter-branch coordination; the ordinary respect that one branch of government owes the others; and the quality of the work product of the rulemaking process. Obviously, political and social policy imperatives may tempt legislators to bypass the objective and orderly process of the rulemakers in favor of quick and popular results. As the recent evidence, civil, and criminal advisory committees met and considered the new rules during the 150-day statutory period. The Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence also solicited public comment on the rules, sending the rules to 900 evidence professors and 40 women's rights organizations. The overwhelming majority of judges, lawyers, law professors, and organizations responding stated their opposition to the rules, principally on the grounds that they contained numerous drafting problems apparently not intended by their authors and would permit the admission of unfairly prejudicial evidence. The committee received 84 responses, representing 112 individuals and 16 organizations. Of the total responses, 100 individuals and organizations were opposed, 10 were supportive, and 18 either were neutral or recommended modifications.

Law professors were opposed to the new rules by 56 to 3.

The Judicial Conference formally asked Congress to reconsider its decision to adopt the new rules, thereby delaying their effective date for another 150 days. Alternatively, the Conference recommended that Congress enact substitute language prepared by the Advisory Committee on the Rules of Evidence that would not change the substance of the congressional enactment but would clarify drafting ambiguities and eliminate possible constitutional infirmities. JUDICIAL time—through adherence at least to the spirit of the Rules Enabling Act.

On occasion, members of Congress work cooperatively with the rules committees, deferring legislative proposals in order to give the rules committees the opportunity to consider them as part of the rulemaking process. Congress also has the option of requesting that the Judicial Conference study a particular subject and report its findings and recommendations. The 1994 crime control legislation, for example, asked the Judicial Conference to evaluate and report on whether the Federal Rules of Evidence should be amended to guarantee that the confidentiality of communications between sexual assault victims and their therapists or counselors will be adequately protected in federal court proceedings.

Recent experience, thus, suggests that a de facto dual track procedure might emerge to deal with rules amendments. On the one hand, the great majority of rules changes would continue to be handled through the Rules Enabling Act procedure. On the other hand, proposed changes with political implications might be referred by the judiciary committees of Congress to the rules committees of the Judicial Conference for consideration on an expedited basis.

F. National Uniformity and Local Rules

Local court rules have been criticized by Congress and commentators as a threat to the goal of uniform, simple rules of federal practice.
and a serious trap for lawyers. Criticism has also been directed at the sheer number of local rules, which makes it difficult for lawyers to practice effectively in more than one jurisdiction. It has been argued, too, that some local rules are inconsistent with the national rules.

The 1988 amendments to the Rules Enabling Act were designed in part to restrict the use of local rules. They set forth procedural requirements for courts to follow in adopting rules and provide an oversight mechanism to ensure their consistency with each other and with national rules. Nevertheless, there are more than 5000 local rules regulating civil procedure alone, not including standing orders and other local procedural requirements.

The Standing Committee established a Local Rules Project in 1985 to review the local rules of the district courts and the rules of the courts of appeals. The project's analysis of the rules and internal operating procedures of the courts of appeals led the Advisory Committee on Appellate Rules to propose various amendments to the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure that substitute a single, national rule for local variations. The Local Rules Project has also informed the district courts of problems with their local rules, including inconsistencies with national rules or statutes, and it has devised a uniform numbering system for local civil rules keyed to the numbering of the national rules. Through voluntary cooperation with the courts and the circuit judicial councils, progress is being made toward reducing the number of local rules and improving their content.

Federal rule amendments are pending in the Supreme Court that would require local court rules to conform to any uniform numbering system that the Judicial Conference may prescribe, thereby making it easier for an increasingly national bar to locate a local rule that applies to a particular procedural issue. The amendments would also provide that no local rule imposing a requirement of form may be enforced in a manner that causes a party to lose rights because of a nonwillful failure to comply with the requirement. Finally, the rules would prohibit a court from imposing sanctions or other disadvantages for noncompliance with any requirement not set forth in federal law, federal rule, or local court rule, unless the alleged violator has been furnished with actual notice of the requirement in the particular case.

In addition, many courts and local rules committees have solicited assistance from the Local Rules Project's director, Mary P. Squiers, on how to re-number the rules and how to draft particular rules more precisely and coherently.

The Civil Justice Reform Act of 1990 has been seen as an even greater threat to uniformity of federal practice. The Act encourages each court to experiment and innovate procedurally, taking into account the assessments and recommendations of an advisory group of local lawyers and litigants. It requires the courts to consider six case management "principles and guidelines" prescribed in the statute and authorizes them to include in their plan an additional five "techniques" of litigation management and cost and delay reduction. The principles, guidelines, and techniques set forth in the Act, if adopted by a district court, have been claimed to supersede certain provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Some commentators argue that the Civil Justice Reform Act has resulted in much greater "balkanization" of civil practice and procedure among the ninety-four district courts. In addition, the December 1, 1992 amendments to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26, dealing with pretrial disclosure and discovery, authorize the district courts individually to "opt out" of its provisions, thereby adding further variations to practice among the district courts.\textsuperscript{177}

The Civil Justice Reform Act, however, contemplates a possible return to greater national uniformity following a review of the results of its mandated pilot programs. The Judicial Conference will consider the results of a comprehensive empirical study assessing the extent to which costs and delays will have been reduced as a result of the Act's pilot programs and experimentation.\textsuperscript{178} The Conference must submit a report to Congress by December 31, 1996, recommending whether the Act's principles and guidelines should be made mandatory and incorporated in the federal rules. The Conference is further required to "initiate" appropriate changes to the federal rules to implement any changes recommended.\textsuperscript{179}

Can greater national uniformity in federal practice and procedure be achieved? Probably so—but not before the period of experimentation and evaluation required by the Civil Justice Reform Act has been concluded. The \textit{Proposed Long Range Plan for the Federal Courts} recognizes that some local rules are appropriate to account for differing local conditions and to allow experimentation with new procedures.\textsuperscript{180} It declares, however, that the long term emphasis of the courts should be on promoting nationally uniform rules of practice and procedure.\textsuperscript{181} To this end, the Plan calls for the Judicial Conference and the circuit judicial councils to exercise their statutory authority\textsuperscript{182} to review local rules and reduce the number

CONCLUSION

The organizational structure and the procedural approach of the rulemaking process are largely accepted as fundamentally sound by Congress, the bench, and the bar. Nevertheless, specific procedural aspects of the process have been criticized in recent years. In response, the process has been reexamined and periodically renewed as part of: (1) the Judicial Conference's "fresh look" at the process in the 1980s; (2) the five-year review of rulemaking by Congress that culminated in the 1988 amendments to the Rules Enabling Act; and (3) the judiciary's ongoing long range planning efforts.

Enormous progress has been made toward opening the rulemaking process and to stimulating participation by the bench, bar, academia, and the public. All activities of the rules committees are documented and readily accessible. Several important opportunities and challenges, however, remain to be addressed by the rules committees. The most common complaints are that the rules are not as simple, well written, and predictable as they once were and that federal practice is far less uniform than it should be. Moreover, Congress on occasion does not adhere to the time-tested and orderly process established by the Rules Enabling Act.

The newly approved Long Range Plan for the Federal Courts recognizes these problems and calls upon the judiciary to place greater emphasis on adopting rules that promote simplicity in procedure, fairness in administration, and the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of litigation. It also calls for adherence to the Rules Enabling Act process, greater uniformity in federal practice, fewer local rules, and greater participation by the bar in the rulemaking process. The recommendations of the Plan, together with ongoing scrutiny by the bench, bar, academia, Congress, and the public, will ensure the continuing renewal of the federal rulemaking process.
